Many neural and signaling pathways are known to act together in vertebrate retina to establish and maintain the correct retinal position and development of the underlying neural circuitry. However, little is known about how these signals interact to control the growth, differentiation, and survival of the retinal neurons.

The Drosophila eye provides a powerful model for studying these issues. In the fly, visual information is processed by four different photoreceptors: rods, cones, R7 and R8, all of which are highly specialized cells in the outermost layer of the retina. The phototransduction cascade in these cells has been studied extensively, and genetic approaches have uncovered many new aspects of the cascade.

However, our understanding of how the cell bodies of the photoreceptors are correctly positioned and differentiated in the outermost layer of the eye remains rudimentary. In this proposal we plan to test the hypothesis that the polarity of the photoreceptors is established through the cooperation of several extracellular signals such as growth factors and hormones with each other, and also with intracellular and intercellular signaling pathways. We also will determine the mode of action of the known Hh signaling pathway on the position and the polarity of the retina through genetic manipulations in the different cell types. Together, these experiments will provide new insights into the normal mechanism of retinal position and polarity establishment during development. One of the first patients treated at the new Trauma and Orthopaedics Centre has received a plastic hip replacement. The man, who has not been named, is thought to be the first patient in Britain to receive a plastic, ultra-lightweight hip implant made in Leeds by medical specialist Maccabi Healthcare Services. The new implant offers patients a better option than metal on metal implants, which have been around for about a decade. But while they have improved over the years and are not associated with adverse effects like metal on metal, they are more expensive.

Article content OTTAWA — Alberta may be Canada's most conservative province, but don't expect the rest of the country to treat it kindly. In fact, when Alberta's premier, Rachel Notley, went to a climate summit in Paris earlier this month, her meetings were marked by infighting with fellow provinces over the place of Albertans in Canada's carbon pricing plan, an issue that has brought the federal government and major western provinces into conflict over the future of Canada's oil industry. We apologize, but this video has failed to load. tap here to see other videos from our team. Try refreshing your browser, or Alberta wants to be part of the carbon plan but so do the other provinces. Is that a conflict? Back to video And as the federal government prepares to set the carbon price to start in January, at least one of the other provinces, Ontario, is not willing to compromise on its proposal to make the price apply to its emissions as well. "I think Alberta is being cast into the wilderness," said Jonathan Chevreau, an analyst with Tindale Forensics and a former senior economist with the Ecofiscal Commission, which advises the federal government on ecological policies.(Reuters Health) - When kids head back to school in September, who should be on the first day and first class roster? For some parents, who can answer that question depends on whether the kids are first-generation college students or their own children. Among parents whose children already attend college or high school, that decision may come down to where the child or one of the parents has gone to college or graduate school. "For people who are in private schools, it's a factor of 'which school we like' more," said study co-author Vicki Graham
